

Fourteen years ago, it sounded silly to think that we would enact legislation to prohibit sugar

Pat doesn't concentrate on Jell-O jokes. His political cartoons have appeared in the Wall Street Journal, the Los Angeles Times and the Guardian of London. He was born in Salt Lake City but grew up in Oceanside California, where his father was mayor. His interest in politics was peaked in high school, when he participated in a PBS interview of Ronald Reagan. He graduated from Brigham Young University. (Which I reminded him, was the driving force behind getting Utah to vote Jell-O the official Utah State Snack.) He has been on the staff of the Salt Lake City Tribune since 1979. He is the author of several books, including “Dinosaurs of Utah” (which is not a political comment on the political situation in Utah), “This Is The Place” a young adult history

So many thanks to Pat Bagley for allowing me to reprint his Jell-O cartoon. I will be featuring some Jell-O cartoons this year in the Jell-O Gallery, including the five Bagley cartoons. In the 1950s, Jell-O hired several cartoonists to create Jell-O cartoons for advertising, which included Hank Ketchum, creator of "Dennis the Menace."
